humor Middle English: via Old French from Latin humor 'moisture', from humere (see HUMID). The original sense was 'bodily fluid' (surviving in aqueous humor and vitreous humor, fluids in the eyeball); it was used specifically for any of the cardinal humours (see sense 3), whence 'mental disposition' (thought to be caused by the relative proportions of the humours). This led, in the 16th cent., to the senses 'state of mind, mood' (see sense 2) and 'whim, fancy', hence to humour someone 'to indulge a person's whim'. Sense 1 dates from the late 16th cent.

The word originally denoted a person of a religion other than one's own, specifically a Muslim (to a Christian), a Christian (to a Muslim), or a Gentile (to a Jew).

inn Old English (in the sense 'dwelling place, lodging'): of Germanic origin; related to IN. In Middle English the word was used to translate Latin hospitium (see HOSPICE), denoting a house of residence for students: this sense is preserved in the names of some buildings formerly used for this purpose, notably Gray's Inn and Lincoln's Inn, found in London's legal district. The current sense dates from late Middle English.

instance Middle English: via Old French from Latin instantia 'presence, urgency', from instare 'be present, press upon', from in- 'upon' + stare 'to stand'. The original sense was 'urgency, urgent entreaty', surviving in at the instance of. In the late 16th cent. the word denoted a particular case cited to disprove a general assertion, derived from medieval Latin instantia 'example to the contrary' (translating Greek enstasis 'objection'); hence the meaning 'single occurrence.'

jack late Middle English: from Jack, pet form of the given name John. The word also denoted various devices saving human labor, as though one had a helper (senses 1 and 4), and in compounds such as JACKHAMMER and JACKKNIFE); the general sense 'laborer' arose in the early 18th cent. and survives in LUMBERJACK, STEEPLEJACK, etc. Since the mid-16th cent. a notion of 'smallness' has arisen, hence senses 5 and 6.
